Western Kentucky: a deadly and expensive war-within-a-war that raged behind the front, often out of the headlines. In 1862, the region was infested with guerrilla activity that pitted brother against brother and neighbor against neighbor in a struggle that recognized few boundaries and took hundreds of lives, destroyed or captured millions of dollars of supplies, and siphoned away thousands of men from the Union war effort.

Confederate Col. Adam Rankin Johnson and his 10th Kentucky Partisan Rangers wreaked havoc on Union supply lines and garrisons from the shores of southern Indiana, in the communities of western Kentucky, and even south into Tennessee. His rangers seemed unbeatable and uncatchable - often disbanding and melting back into the countryside, until they could safely reform to strike again.

Join the Dan Sickles Civil War Round Table and author Derrick Lindow for a closer look at the participants, the changes in strategy, and the civilians caught in the middle.
